Already in Greco-Roman antiquity, physical exercises existed. Gymnastic exercises were an integral part of (male) civic life—not only in Athens. At Gymnasiums, men competed against each other and thereby they stayed fit for war. In addition with regularly recurring sports festivals, extensive competitions—so-called Agones—took place throughout the Greek cultural area. The most important Agones took place every four years in Olympia (Peloponnese) in honour of the godfather Zeus. But also in Athens, there was a big festival every four years in honour of the goddess Athena, protector of Athens. Usually, part of these festivals was an extensive competition program of gymnastic, equestrian and fine-arts disciplines. Especially during the Roman Empire, these Greek-style competitions flourished. In the 3rd century A.D. in the Roman Empire, there were circa 500 regular festivals with sports competitions. In Greece, it was customary to erect bronze statues of the winners of such competitions. The Romans appreciated these statues very much and made copies out of marble. They used these to decorate their villas and thermae.

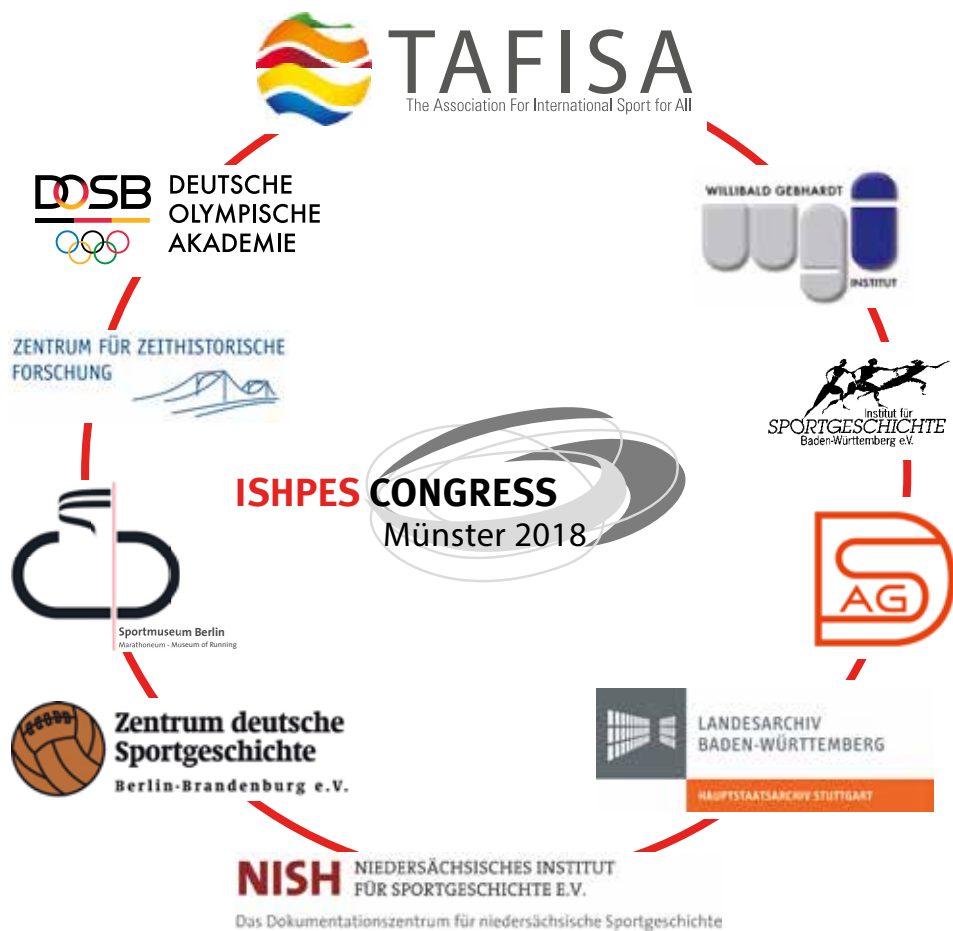

Since over 100 years, the Archaeological Museum of the University of Münster owns a large collection of plaster casts of such ancient statues. For the special exhibition on the occasion of the ISHPES congress 2018, the Archaeological Museum shows some plaster casts of athlete statues from the 5th to the 1st century B.C. This includes ancient statues in original size, e.g. the famous “Discobolus” of Myron and the “Doryphoros” of Polykleitos. The Archaeological Museum also has models of various ancient sites and the special exhibition shows models of the Panathenaic Stadium in Athens and the ancient Olympia in scale 1:100.
